I should tour Bryson City and the surrounding area. When Dad called this morning, he said I could drive to some of the nearby attractions. He suggested a trip to the Cherokee Indian Reservation, or heading into Gatlinburg, Tennessee, via the Smoky Mountain Parkway, for a day trip. "I bet it's real pretty this time of year," he said.

His voice filled my heart with everything I know to be good, and I knew that I should just hop in my Jeep, buckle up, and go.

I rest my arms against the Adirondack chair's flat, smooth arms. One day, I think—one day the thought of driving won't make me nauseous. One day I won't have to deal with all the post-traumatic stuff. One day I won't care about the scars on my body. One day my days will be as beautiful as Neville Mar-riner's symphony playing selections from Vivaldi. Wherever I go, I will be his "Summer" concerto.

Right now a trek in my Jeep down curvy roads into Bryson City for a stop at Ingle's or The Center is all that I can handle.

A cardinal flies by, and his bright color makes me see only one thing—blood. Blood, fresh and dried, all over the seats of Lucas's Mustang. I try to force away the memory of that rainy

JERIMOTH HAD RETURNED HOME from the Passover feast convinced that he would find Jerusha waiting for him. He flung open the door of his house calling her name, but only his startled servant answered. Throughout each passing day, Jerimoth had paused from his labors and scanned the horizon, no longer looking for the dreaded Assyrian soldiers, but for his daughter, walking up the road toward home. Before retiring each evening, he gazed longingly in the direction the soldiers had carried Jerusha, watching for her long after the sun had set and the dim light of the flickering stars made visibility beyond the borders of his vineyard impossible. Jerimoth would lie awake late into the night, listening in the darkness for the sound of Jerusha's footsteps on the hard-packed road. The first rays of dawn would find him hurrying to the highest point of his land, scanning the horizon for a glimpse of his daughter.

He had done the same when he returned home after celebrating the Feast of Pentecost—but no Jerusha.

When harvesttime ended and Jerimoth had stored away the last of his crops, he and his family traveled to Jerusalem again for the Feast of Tabernacles, bringing the tenth portion of all his crops as a sacrifice for Yahweh. Once again they stayed with Hilkiah, and, like the other pilgrims, they slept outside on the rooftop in rustic booths to celebrate the long wanderings of their forefathers in the wilderness. The Feast and Jerimoth seemed oblivious to the late hour. Insteabed, they settled down in the large main room of F lighting all the oil lamps, talking together.

"It's hard to believe that the festival is over already."
"Yes, it has gone quickly, hasn't it?" Hilkiah agree-is the final convocation already. I suppose you'll need to afterward?"

"That's when our caravan is leaving."
"I hate to see you go, my friend. I can't tell you enjoy our visits together." Hilkiah's eyes twinkled warn-light. "Naturally, Eliakim and I will look forward to sein the spring for Passover. Right, son?"

"Absolutely!" Eliakim replied. As much as he hat-his father had been right once again. Eliakim had grow-Jerimoth and Hodesh and their little girl. Only the gh-daughter, Jerusha, who intruded into every conv-Eliakim uncomfortable.

"Then it's settled, yes?" Hilkiah asked. "You will again in the spring?"

Jerimoth gave a tired smile, a rare sight on his

Salvador was of this variety—nor was he interested in finding out.

"You were a big help today," he said as Salvador passed by, the PVC pipes bobbing like javelins in his arms.

"Thank you, Father," came the accented reply accompanied by the characteristic smile and nod. The man's voice was light and scratchy, like that of a washed-up crooner who had traded his talent for several decades of smoking.

"We may partake in some festivities later, if you'd care to join us. Just a little song and dance, nothing too elaborate."

"No, no, but thank you."

"Okay. If you change your mind, you know where we'll be. We'd love to have you."

Another agreeable nod, and then he moved on.

The last of the day's light died away, and torches were lit to aid in the final bits of work and cleanup. Breimayer kept watching Salvador, ever hopeful of that momentary glimpse beneath the surface. When he dissolved unceremoniously into the darkness, no one else took particular notice; they had seen it a thousand times. He would return tomorrow, after all.

Pearl and I both loved Lao She and Cao Yu. Among their best were The Big House, Full Moon, and The Marriage of a Puppet Master. We favored Full Moon in particular for the author's sensitivity. The story was about a single mother who was driven into prostitution. Although her daughter tries to avoid following in her mother's footsteps, she ends up swallowing the same fate.

Pearl liked the story but resented the novel's bitter hopelessness.
She preferred stories that offered hope in the end, however tragic. "The character must believe in himself and I must have the stamina to Brothers* is the best example of the poor peasants were forced to become bandits. But the novel is filled with energy. There is no bitterness to it.

To me, this is the Chinese essence!"

"Chinese critics don't share your opinion," I argued. "They say All Men Are Brothers lacks sophistication. They consider it folk art, not literature."

"That is exactly why things must change," Pearl shot back. "Everyday life has a power of its own. And it's important to pay attention to it.
Look at Soo-ching, the lady who delivered her son in my backyard!
I bet she bit off the umbilical cord like the character Er-niang in All Men Are Brothers. I didn't see her pity herself. She was ready to go on.

She glanced over at Jamie, who naturally had no idea what her father meant.

now, and in some ways I was more excited about that than in meeting my husband, because I had heard about Snow Flower's home and family for so long, while I knew almost nothing about the man I was going to marry. Still, although I was filled with anticipation—at last I'd be going to Snow Flower's house!—she seemed vague about the details.

"Someone from your in-laws' home will bring you to me," Snow Flower said.

"Do you think my mother-in-law will join us for your Sitting and Singing?" I asked. This would please me, because she would see me with my laotang.

"Lady Lu is too busy. She has many duties, just as you will one day."

"But I'll get to meet your mother, elder sister, and... who else will be invited?"

I had expected that Mama and Aunt would be part of Snow Flower's rituals. She seemed so much a member of our family that I thought she would want them there.

"Auntie Wang will come," she said.

The matchmaker would probably make several appearances during Snow Flower's Sitting and Singing.

Lots of people play the piano. It couldn't be that hard."
"I don't know..." Her father obviously didn't believe a word of it.

For just a moment, Jamie had a déjà-vu-all-over-again feeling, just like his last moment of insanity, when he'd applied for the bakery job. He felt the same kind of craziness taking over as he watched his hand go up without even asking it to.

"I play a little piano."
They looked at him as if they'd never seen him before in their lives.

"You?" they both echoed. Anne looked at her dad for a little help.
